Professor David Vogel will discuss what corporate social responsibility can, cannot, and should accomplish in a modern capitalist economy. He will critically explore both the important potential of corporate social responsibility to improve a firm’s reputation and financial performance, as well as the factors that limit the impact and effectiveness of a firm’s corporate social responsibility strategies. Vogel argues that the market both promotes and limits CSR: the good news is that the market does not penalize more responsible firms; the bad news is that neither does it necessarily reward them. He will also discuss how companies should approach, assess and communicate their CSR initiatives.

The lecture will be followed by a panel discussion with Thomas Scheiwiller, Partner and Global Sustainability Leader, PricewaterhouseCoopers and Professor David Vogel.
